

Participation

Isaac Wilhelm (iwilhelm@nus.edu.sg)

The following four criteria will be used to determine your participation grade.

- X : the frequency with which you attend class.
 - $X = \frac{A}{T}$, where A is the number of classes you attend and T is the total number of classes for the semester.
- Y : how well you participate during class.
 - Y ranges from 0 to 1. If you speak at least once during each class, $Y = 1$. If you speak less than once per class, it could still be the case that $Y = 1$, depending on how difficult it is for you to speak in class (shy people should not be punished merely for being shy), how on-point your contributions are, and so on.
 - Things that lower your Y score include—but are not limited to—being on your phone, sleeping, and using your computer for anything other than notes and course readings.
- Z : how well you coordinate with me.
 - Z ranges from 0 to 1. A lower Z score means that you did not communicate with me well, whenever communication was needed. For instance, suppose that you set up a meeting with me, but fail to show. If you do not let me know why beforehand, and afterwards you also do not explain yourself, then your Z score will be lowered. A higher Z score means that when coordination was needed, you did a good job of it.
- N : whether or not you conduct yourself appropriately during philosophical conversations.
 - N ranges from 0 to 1. A score of $N = 0$ means that you were mean, nasty, rude, domineering, and so on. A score of $N = 1$ means that you were a reasonable human being.

Your participation grade will be determined by the formula below.

$$\text{Participation grade} = 25 \cdot (X + Y + Z + N)$$

As mentioned on the syllabus, participation is worth up to 100 points. So if you get perfect scores on X , Y , Z , and N —that is, if you get a 1 for each of those quantities—then your participation grade will be a perfect 100.

Sometimes, a student's circumstances require that their participation grade be computed in a manner different from the one just described. So I reserve the right to change individual students' participation grades, if the circumstances warrant.
